A GREAT PANTHER FEAST

CLINE TO PARTICIPATE-SPEECHES.

Reffer American Sportsman:

The quarters at the Smithsonian Institution, eccupied as the office of the United States Fish Commissioner, were filled a few days since with devotees to science and the dectrines of Epicurus; the occasion being a grand banquet on panther fiesh, a fine specimen having been received from the Recky Mountains.

The fiesh of the suimal being as rigid as when ut recently it left the severe cold of its native wilds, it was decided to take advantage of the opportunity offered for practical as well as scient evestigation. Hence the novel idea of a

Once within, imagination turns to bewilderment over the dasking splendors of this seatom seat-forum. Casting the eye upward, we contemplate with wonder the delicate structure of the various ornaments hanging ofer us. Indeed, some of these appear possessed of life; or, our senses being de-ceived, are the gyrations of these delicately-edu-structed pendants due to some secret unseen agency, or to a disturbance of the atmospheric equilibrium caused by the swaying human mass

The occasion, which was before declared to be meal, was becoming one of rars enjoyment. Conciliators measures, however, happily restored or der, and M. this point, his remarks were met with mingled approval and disaphrobation, which amounted to an uproar. During the storm, the Marine band, which had been detained on "Elkeg's ridge," appeared, and, as if by inspiration, struck up "Roll on thou deep and dark blue ocean, roll.". At the close of which the speaker, finding his subject out of harmony with the feelings of the majority prosent, substituted with his usual dexterity "The Washington Monument." He subgissed at some length the feeling of pride which must take peasestion of every American at first beholding the magnificent proportions of this colosial tribute to our country's father, and alluded dispacagingly to the idea recently advanced by the press of the country that "It, had better be leveled with the ground." And the volume of his remarks he was understood to refer feelingly to the difficulties experienced by a tyro in natural history, as exemplified in his own case. He assured the beginner, however, that "in the not far-dictant fature—eyen before maturity—there were honors which perseverance failed to reap. Success in the study of natural history, like that in any other branch of knowledge, depend upon application, application, arriteration." Of so much importance did the speaker consider the outtration of this faculty that we would, for the benefit of the believed children about him, "simplify his remarks by quoting that not uncommon injunction," If at first you don't succeed, sin."

Referring to some branches of the science to which he had particularly devoted a long life, he mentioned that after years of study of antero posterior symmetry he had never been so theroughly convinced of the opposiness of his views on the subject, as "when gasing upon the neble animal that had so recently fallen a "saccurrent to science."

He compared the length of the tail of the panther to that of the magple, as showing (as he claimed) the "correllation existing between these two representatives of the animal and vegetable kingdom."

The cloquence of Professer Cones, both in manner and matter, slicited merited applause.
